Students give a boost with LIFT

A staggering 41 percent of Philadelphia residents lack access to the Internet, according to Mayor Michael Nutter. Since so many basic activities take place online now, this lack is more than just a minor inconvenience.

LIFT is a community-based resource that helps people gain internet access, as well as learn the skills needed for job searches, applying for housing and public benefits and filing taxes. In addition to paid staff, students from Drexel, LaSalle, Messiah College, Penn, St. Joseph’s and Temple volunteer at the two local offices of this national organization.

The students not only help LIFT clients, they also benefit from learning a great deal from their work. In fact, students in one new Drexel class, the Culture of Poverty, volunteer at LIFT as part of their coursework. Professor Cyndi Rickards, who teaches that class, says, “Service learning courses are at the heart of Drexel’s unique approach to education — it is experiential learning at its best! This group of students exemplified a commitment to civic engagement in our larger Drexel and Philadelphia community. Our LIFT partners offered students insight into a culture many have never experienced.”

Dressing up the dining hall

College students will never be known for their well-balanced diets, but some campuses make meals more interesting. Grilled cheese and pizza are, of course, still on the menu.

Typically, college is not fondly remembered for culinary experiences, as students shuttle between the cafeteria and campus pizza joint. But there are plenty of students and administrators alike who are pushing for more creative forms of nourishment. Here are three of the best campus culinary ideas taking hold at schools across the country in 2012.

Michigan Technological University

‘Khana Khazana’

What started as a fundraiser for Haitian relief is now a thriving weekly tradition at MTU. Each Friday, a different international student plays guest chef at the university cafeteria, sharing a favorite dish with fellow students. With access to exotic cuisine available on the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, “Khana Khazana” (Hindi for “food treasure”) attempts to open the minds of MTU students while filling their bellies along the way.

University of California, Riverside

‘Culinary Chameleon’

While food trucks are deeply ingrained in the culture of urban Northeast campuses, they’re still largely an experiment at West Coast schools. Rather than contracting vendors, this month UC Riverside is attempting to launch a truck owned and operated by the university. The Chameleon promises to adjust its location and menu at the whim of the student body. Will this lone lizard catch on in a Cali campus? Check back next year.

Boston University

‘Fancy Fridays’

With plenty of ironic flair, every Friday BU students Feast their very finest attire at Shattuck Hall. The cuisine is still 100 percent BU dining services — grilled cheese (fromage grille, perhaps?) and pizza — but the speeches are high brow, as founding student Thomas Unger offers leads sparking older toasts extolling the virtues of cufflinks and other accoutrements.

Local leader

In 2011, the University of Pennsylvania was recognized by PETA for offering a variety of vegan options, including Vegan Days. Cheese pizzas, cranberry scones, Indian dishes and carob-chip banana squares. Last semester, the school’s dining program teamed up with the Penn Vegan Society for a hairless good potluck to educate students on plant-based goodies.

Fancy Fridays is a regular event at Boston University.
